Abstract

Without collecting patients in one efficient network, subject through a patient portal, it is the health-care organization's responsibility to provide them with the necessary instructions to do so through the process. Patient empowerment often requires a straightforward assessment of steps for the patient when it is a required requirement. Another way to ensure it the patient understands how to effectively interact is to have them interact with the system for a short time. A representative of the health care organization must, ideally, follow up to ensure the existing patient health information is as best as possible in the system and to provide an the patient's complete understanding of the patient's data history. Some states, for example, require that every patient should receive the necessary and appropriate and the necessary, and other a minimum of the time.
