

Scholarship Statement of Financial Need: Drafts, Feedback, & Line Editing

Project Overview

Client & Topic: This client was a PhD student applying for a scholarship that would not only fund her research, but would also connect her with resources, scholars, mentors, and hands-on experiences to further her work. Long-term, this client would like to work for the organization that hosts the scholarship, so she also viewed her application to the scholarship as a strategic career move.

Like all grad students, this client was on a budget. So I maximized her investment by putting some of the work back in her hands. I kept my time with the text minimal and instead made suggestions that she could implement herself.

Financial need is a personal topic and my client's story was particularly sensitive. So I focused on making sure this client's statement balanced dignity, gratitude, and real need. She gave me permission to share a redacted version of her writing process.

Context: This financial need statement was for a highly competitive federal scholarship. It was part of a large application packet that also included a statement of intent, a research statement, and multiple letters of recommendation.

Audience: The deciding body for this scholarship is a group of federal employees, scholars, professors, and extension officers. I tailored my client's language to meet the audience's expectations.

Order of Feedback: Below, you'll see the essay evolve from first to final draft.

This particular project had a good amount of back-and-forth, since the client was implementing my suggestions as we moved forward. You'll notice my feedback began at the organizational level. Once the writer improved the flow and tightened the prose based on my feedback, I switched to sentence-level editing. For the penultimate draft, I zoomed back out to big-picture suggestions.

Editorial Overview: The first draft was full of great material and heart; however, it was weighed down with unnecessary details and a distracting order of events.

Together, my client and I reorganized the information, reduced the length by half, and highlighted the most compelling portions of her story.

The final draft draws the reader in, makes a compelling argument for awarding my client the scholarship, and closes by pointing toward the greater impact of her research.

While an editor's job is of course to clean up grammar and word-choice, that's only the beginning of the process. For this project, I also focused on clarity and storytelling. Throughout, I worked to maintain the author's unique voice.
