

When the switch is closed, the circuit is complete and the light bulb will glow. This is because the battery provides the electrical energy that flows through the wire and the light bulb, causing it to heat up and emit light.

The light bulb is a device that converts electrical energy into light and heat. It contains a filament that glows when it is heated by the electric current. The battery is the source of the electrical energy, and the switch is used to control the flow of current.

This diagram illustrates the basic components of an electrical circuit and how they are connected. It shows that for a circuit to work, there must be a complete loop for the current to flow through.

The diagram also shows that the switch is a crucial component for controlling the circuit. When the switch is open, the circuit is broken, and no current flows. When the switch is closed, the circuit is complete, and current flows through the light bulb, causing it to glow.

This diagram is a duplicate of the first one, showing the same circuit components and their connections. It serves to reinforce the understanding of how a simple circuit is constructed and how it operates.

The diagram demonstrates the relationship between the battery, the switch, and the light bulb. It shows that the battery provides the energy, the switch controls the flow, and the light bulb converts the energy into light.

Understanding these basic components and their connections is essential for working with electrical circuits. This diagram provides a clear visual representation of a simple circuit.
