

Chapter 3

The economic dimension of globalization

In Chapters 1 and 2, we noted that evolving forms of digital technology configured around the Internet and social media are often considered the hallmarks of contemporary globalization. Indeed, technological progress of the magnitude seen in the last three decades is also a good indicator for the occurrence of profound social transformations centred on the market. Changes in the ways in which people undertake economic production and organize the exchange of commodities represent one obvious aspect of the great transformation of our age.

Economic globalization refers to the intensification and stretching of economic connections across the globe. Gigantic flows of capital mediated by digital technology and standardized means of transportation have stimulated trade in goods and services. Extending their reach around the world, markets have migrated to cyberspace and integrated local, national, and regional economies. Huge transnational corporations (TNCs), powerful international economic institutions, and gigantic regional business and trade networks like the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC), the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), the Southern Common Market (MERCOSUR), and the European Union (EU) have emerged as the major building blocks of the 21st century's global economic order.
