

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then asks randomly whether they should be given points. It counts the number of times. The data were not plotted until the end of the study, but that presentation was an effective way to allow the group to see what was happening. That makes responses about the number of times they entered higher. The distribution was not uniform, and the group needs the graph to see the distribution. The graph shows that people entered the room more often when they were asked than when they were not asked, supporting the idea that people respond better when they are being watched.

The authors took a more sophisticated approach. The authors used a coin toss to decide whether the student, the other, or neither should enter the room. The authors recorded the time each student entered, and the time each student entered the room.
