The research conducted by the authors is subject to several methodological limitations. The first major limitation may be attributed to a reliance on self-reports as the primary measure, potentially introducing common method variance. Additionally, the cross-sectional design limits the ability to establish causal relationships between variables. The sample size, while adequate for the statistical analyses, may not fully represent the broader population of employees. Finally, the study's focus on organizational commitment may overlook other important factors influencing employee behavior.
