Overview

Citizenship can refer to a legal status, a set of rights, an individual's engagement in political life, or an identity. The course examines these different aspects of citizenship in the context of migration.

Every state is tasked with defining membership and rights within the broader political community.

Yet migration – both immigration and emigration – challenges the ideal-typical vision of a state wherein the borders of the citizenry perfectly coincide with territorial borders, and where citizens belong to the same nation forged by an (invented) shared history.

The course draws on theories and research from politics, sociology, anthropology, and history. It covers cases from most regions of the world, including Western Europe, North America, East Central Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. By looking at countries with different nation-building and migration histories, political systems, and levels of economic development, the course aims to enrich students' understanding of citizenship.

The course is divided into three parts. The first part of this course looks at the state's efforts to define and control its citizenry. What are the key principles used to establish who belongs and who does not? How is citizenship crafted in new states and post-conflict states, where the imperatives of nation building, state building, and reconciliation often collide?

The second part of the course looks at how migrants' political engagement and identities are shaped by citizenship policies. When and why do migrants remain active citizens in their home countries? When and why do they become engaged in their host state's political life? Are homeland-oriented and host-state oriented active citizenship necessarily contradictory? And how do citizenship policies affect identity?

The final section of the course looks at several emerging issues in citizenship research. We will look at the relationship between regionalism and citizenship within regional organizations in Europe, Africa, Southeast Asia, and the Americas. We will also look the trend of selectively liberal citizenship policies towards wealthy individuals and athletes.

At the end of the course, students will have a thorough understanding of citizenship's role in rights, identity, and status, and how it affects the lives of emigrants and immigrants.
