Abstract

These authors have argued that the use of the term "transformation" is problematic because it implies a linear process, which is not always the case. They argue that the term "transformation" is too broad and does not capture the complexity of the process. They suggest that the term "transformation" should be used only when the process is linear and predictable. In contrast, the term "transition" is more appropriate for non-linear and unpredictable processes. They argue that the term "transition" is more descriptive of the process and its outcomes. They also argue that the term "transition" is more inclusive and does not imply a linear process. They suggest that the term "transition" should be used to describe the process of change in a more general sense. They argue that the term "transition" is more appropriate for the study of social change and development. They suggest that the term "transition" is more descriptive of the process and its outcomes.
