How Do Plants Make Food?

Plants make their own food through a process called photosynthesis.

Photosynthesis is the process by which plants use sunlight, water, and carbon dioxide to produce glucose and oxygen.

Plants use sunlight to provide energy for photosynthesis. They absorb water from the soil through their roots and carbon dioxide from the air through their leaves.

Plants use the energy from sunlight to convert water and carbon dioxide into glucose, a sugar that plants use for energy. They also release oxygen as a byproduct of photosynthesis.

Plants use their leaves to absorb sunlight. The leaves are green because they contain chlorophyll, a pigment that absorbs light energy.

Plants use their roots to absorb water. The roots are long and thin, which allows them to reach deep into the soil.

Plants use their stems to transport water and nutrients. The stems are thick and woody, which allows them to support the weight of the plant.

Plants use their leaves to lose water vapor. This process is called transpiration and helps to cool the plant.

Plants use their roots to anchor themselves in the soil. This helps them to stay upright and prevents them from being blown away by the wind.
