

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group. The name that is called reads the problem, and that person then solves the problem. A new problem is then presented and the person that has read that problem randomly selects the person to read the next problem.

After the 10 problems are all completed, each is read again. The group that read the problem receives the average number of seconds it took to solve that problem. The person spending the least amount of time receives a reward, and the person spending the most time receives a punishment (usually a small amount of time taken away from the next session).

The authors took a more sophisticated approach to collect their data and the person that reads the problem, the time, number of times the problem was read, and the number of problems spending the least amount of time, receiving a reward, and the number of times spending the most time receiving a punishment were all recorded. Using this data, the authors found some surprising outcomes through regression.

One thing going for the authors was having a large sample size. The authors were getting data on 100 and 1000 trials per problem and 1000 trials per person. This really helped.

Their first goal was to see if the number of times a problem was read was related to the time it took to solve the problem. The authors found that the more times a problem was read, the longer it took to solve.

The authors also found that the number of times a problem was read was related to the time it took to solve.

The authors also found that the number of times a problem was read was related to the time it took to solve.

ANSWER EXPLANATION: The first step in the process of the authors' study was to collect data on the number of times a problem was read and the time it took to solve.

ANSWER EXPLANATION: Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group.
