

12. That sales for cash are never entered in the customer's account.
 13. That sales on time are always entered in the customer's (debtor's) account.

Answers to activities

3.1 As we did in Chapter 1, it would be possible to have an inventory account with goods purchased being DEBITED to the inventory account (as purchases represent AN INCREASE in the possession, inventory) and goods sold being CREDITED to it (as sales represent A DECREASE in the possession, inventory).

3.2 If the inventory account shows a debit of £100 and two credit entries totalling £120, the basic profit so far on the goods is £20. If there are no units left, the figure of £20 represents the basic profit earned from that good – a 20 per cent profit.

Assume that the debit entry includes a note that 5 units were purchased, and the credit entries include notes indicating that 1 unit was sold for £40 and then 2 units were sold for £30. Overall basic profit would still be £20 but there are still 2 units in inventory.

Managers know a profit has already been made on the item. They may decide to sell off the remaining units at a lower price, or to increase the selling price, or to do nothing to the selling price. The point is that they have the information in the inventory account with which to make such a decision.

An extra column could be added to each side of the account in order to do this, and this was often done during the 1800 or so years when this method of recording inventory was widely used. It is no longer used in financial accounting.
