

The largest plant-eating dinosaur was the Diplodocus. It was able to raise its head very high so that it could eat leaves from tops of trees.

The Tyrannosaurus Rex was the largest meat-eating dinosaur. The T-Rex, as it is called now, was over six metres high and stood on its back legs. It had sharp teeth and short arms.

Some slow-moving dinosaurs had bony plates as armour, some had bony clubs at the end of their tails, and others had horns, which helped them protect themselves.

Many dinosaurs had hundreds of small sharp teeth inside their jaws. When the teeth were down, there grew new ones. Surprisingly, the brains of all these huge dinosaurs were very small.

There were dinosaur birds too. They had big wings, sometimes up to three metres long. They too had sharp teeth. There were dinosaur fish too that lived in the water.

Where did all these giant creatures go? Did other creatures kill them? Or did they die of some strange disease? We are not sure what happened to them. However, scientists who have studied them feel they probably died as the climate of the earth changed or because there was not enough food to support so many of them.
