Article Points, (bullet)

Teacher's expectations have a significant impact on student achievement. When a teacher expects more from a student, the student tends to perform better. This is because the teacher's expectations create a self-fulfilling prophecy. If a teacher expects a student to do well, the student will work harder to meet those expectations. Conversely, if a teacher expects a student to do poorly, the student may give up more easily, leading to lower achievement.

Teacher expectations also affect the way teachers interact with students. Teachers who have high expectations for their students are more likely to provide them with more challenging tasks and more support. They are also more likely to provide positive feedback and encouragement. On the other hand, teachers who have low expectations for their students are more likely to provide them with less challenging tasks and less support. They are also more likely to provide negative feedback and criticism.

Teacher expectations can also affect the way students feel about school. Students who are expected to do well by their teachers are more likely to feel confident and motivated. They are also more likely to enjoy school and to be more engaged in their learning. Conversely, students who are expected to do poorly by their teachers are more likely to feel discouraged and unmotivated. They are also more likely to dislike school and to be less engaged in their learning.

Teacher expectations can also affect the way students behave in the classroom. Students who are expected to do well by their teachers are more likely to behave well and to follow the rules. They are also more likely to be more responsible and to take more initiative. Conversely, students who are expected to do poorly by their teachers are more likely to behave poorly and to break the rules. They are also more likely to be less responsible and to take less initiative.

What are the overall conclusions about teacher expectations?
What should we do?
