Permanent Magnet DC Motors Stanley Ryan Sifford, 2006 The method of motor comparison for permanent magnet DC motors based on power output at maximum efficiency is developed from tabulated motor data It provides a previously unattained uniform rating technique considering the full interaction of torque speed and input power All values are calculated using readily available manufacturer data Each value is directly related to the point of maximum efficiency Thus the full interaction of the motor is contained at a single operating point The multiport motor model is developed from the basic electrical and dynamic equations and the same data sources used for motor comparison The full motor system including the source impedance motor dynamics and the load impedance is illustrated A linear source impedance is imposed on the torque speed relationship Additional details such as linear viscous friction and Coulomb friction are developed Block diagram modeling coupled with digital simulation tools allows complexity to be progressively increased      Selection and Optimal Use of DC Motor Karen Hong,1994
