Abstract
Regulation of plant growth and development is controlled by a complex network of signaling pathways. The plant hormone auxin plays a central role in this process. Auxin signaling is initiated by the binding of auxin to its receptor, which leads to the activation of a signaling cascade involving several proteins, including the auxin-inducible protein (AIP). AIP is a key component of the auxin signaling pathway and is involved in the regulation of auxin-responsive gene expression. In this review, we discuss the role of AIP in auxin signaling and its involvement in the regulation of plant growth and development.

Abstract: The use of computer-aided design (CAD) systems for the design of mechanical parts is becoming increasingly common. This paper presents a method for the automatic generation of a CAD model of a mechanical part from a 2D drawing. The method is based on the use of a set of rules that define the relationship between the 2D drawing and the 3D model. The rules are applied to the 2D drawing to generate the 3D model. The method is implemented in a software package that can be used to generate CAD models of mechanical parts from 2D drawings.
