its head cut off In the split second or so it took me to appraise the situation I realized he was actually a patient who had mistaken my surgery hours because the light was on It was an easy surmise as his mouth was covered in blood which was still bubbling from between his lips He mumbled something that sounded suspiciously like terror and shot to his feet ready to bolt I dropped the bat my eyes glued to his wound The poor chap must have noticed my preoccupation and that I had dropped my weapon for he sat down with a look of utter defeat in his eyes Hoping I was conveying sympathy after my look of horror I mumbled You poor bastard what have they done to you I led him back to the surgery This time I did remember to lock the door in case his attackers were still in the neighborhood I helped him into the chair and donned gloves and glasses before turning my attention to his plight
