- Abstract: This research is a 10-year (1999–2009) longitudinal comparison of self-reported use of self-help versus controlled substance treatment. Overall 67% of the sample, 60% of the men and 75% of the women, reported use of self-help treatment at least once during the study period. The use of self-help treatment was associated with a number of factors, including being male, being employed, having a high school diploma, and having a history of substance use. The use of self-help treatment was also associated with a number of factors, including being male, being employed, having a high school diploma, and having a history of substance use. The use of self-help treatment was also associated with a number of factors, including being male, being employed, having a high school diploma, and having a history of substance use.
