

1984 XR1000

In custom projects, Harley's XR750 (see pp. 126-29) was clearing up its dirt-track racing, so why not offer a limited run of road-going examples? In 1983 Harley produced the XR1000. They put the alloy heads and twin DuPonts carburetors from the XR750 onto the bottom half of an XL1000 engine. The engine itself was put into a standard XLX chassis. The result was an engine that put out 10 percent more power than the stock Sportster in standard trim, though many owners tuned the bike even more. The result was the fastest production bike Harley ever made, but buyers were not impressed—it looked almost identical to the cheapest bike in the line while costing a good deal more. The XR1000 didn't sell, but the bike is now a collector's piece.
