

Cell Division – Examining Mitosis

Study Guide

Background

All of the genetic information of plants, animals, and other eukaryotic organisms resides within the nucleus of the cell in a diffuse mass of threadlike material called chromatin. When the cell receives the order to divide again, the cell goes through many processes that end in several producing new daughter cells. Interphase occupies the majority of the time that the cell is in that all parts. During interphase the cell grows, replicates its DNA, and goes through further preparations to complete another division. Shortest duration, or mitosis, is the process where the cell cell separates all the duplicated chromatin in structures called chromosomes and then separates and moves duplicated chromosomes. The chromosomes divide during cytokinesis. At the end of cytokinesis, the original parent cell is separated into two new daughter cells.

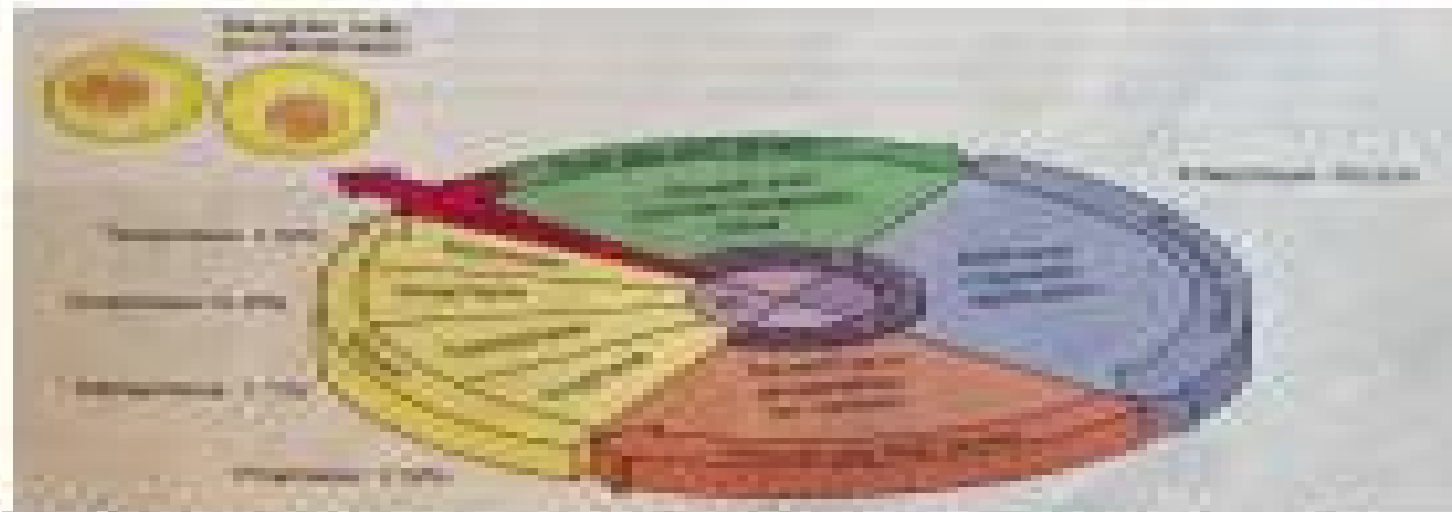

Figure 1: The cell cycle is a continuous process of cell division. The cell cycle is divided into four phases: Interphase (90%), Prophase (10%), Metaphase (5%), and Anaphase (5%). The cell cycle is a continuous process of cell division. The cell cycle is divided into four phases: Interphase (90%), Prophase (10%), Metaphase (5%), and Anaphase (5%).
