

Cell Division – Examining Mitosis

Study Guide

Background

All of the genetic information of plants, animals, and other eukaryotic organisms resides within the nucleus of the cell in a diffuse mass of threadlike material called chromatin. When the chromatin is under the cell cycle, the cell goes through many processes that end in actual production of two new called daughter cells. Interphase occupies the majority of the time that the cell is in that all cycle. During interphase the cell grows, replicates its DNA, and goes through further preparations to complete another division. Shortest duration, or mitosis, is the process where the cell cell completes all the duplicated chromatin in structures called chromosomes and then separates and moves duplicated chromosomes. The chromosomes divide during cytokinesis. At the end of cytokinesis, the original parent cell is separated into two new daughter cells.

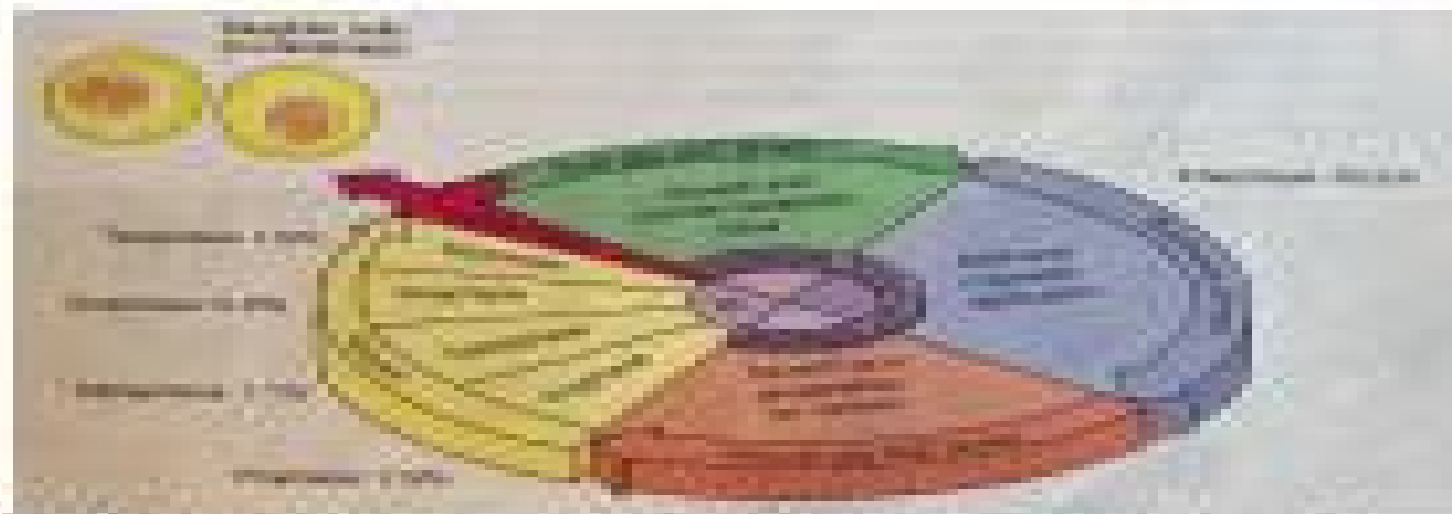

Figure 1: The cell cycle is a continuous process that results in the production of two new daughter cells. The cell cycle is divided into four main phases: Interphase, Prophase, Metaphase, and Anaphase. The duration of each phase is shown in the pie chart. Interphase is the longest phase, accounting for 90% of the cycle. Prophase, Metaphase, and Anaphase are the shortest phases, each accounting for 10%, 5%, and 5% of the cycle, respectively.
