Abstract Background Despite the well-documented benefits of using electronic devices, health professionals increasingly are faced with patients who have limited skills in utilizing them. Many physicians receive little information about computers. The purpose of this study was to describe the computer skills of physicians in a tertiary care hospital. Methods A cross-sectional survey of 100 physicians was conducted. The survey included questions about the physician's use of computers, the physician's confidence in using computers, and the physician's interest in learning more about computers. Results The majority of physicians (80%) reported using computers at least once a week. The majority of physicians (80%) reported being confident in using computers. The majority of physicians (80%) reported being interested in learning more about computers. Conclusions The majority of physicians in this study reported using computers at least once a week, being confident in using computers, and being interested in learning more about computers.
