

The human body is a fascinating object – even a miracle of design and engineering! Just like an ecosystem can be described (e.g., organism, population, community), the human body can also be divided into levels of organization. From largest to smallest, the levels of organization in the human body are organism, organ system, organ, tissue, and cell.

It all starts with this, a microscopic unit of life called cells. These minuscule objects keep going doing their job without you even knowing it. Though all cells perform functions that keep you alive, they all also have a specialized (or special) function or job. Some cells send electrical signals to the brain and are called nerve cells. Nerves are also called neurons. Other cells carry out defense throughout the body and are called red blood cells.

All groups of cells form a tissue, which work together to perform the same function in the body. One type of tissue includes nerves, muscles, epithelial and connective. Muscles tissues contract and relax and allow the body to move, but there are three types of tissues: cardiac (heart muscle), smooth (smooth organs), and skeletal (skeletal muscles). Epithelial tissues cover the surface of the body and the organs. One row of cells is called a skin. Connective tissues connect all the parts of the body and provide support.

Groups of tissues form organs, which sometimes are one plus protected from the rest. One example of an organ is the heart, which is made up of connective tissue, nerve tissue, and cardiac muscle tissue. Although the tissue in organs have specific jobs, they all work together to make the organ work.

All groups of two or more organs that work together to perform a specific function are called an organ system. The human body has eleven organ systems, and each of them have a specific job or role. The circulatory system helps you transport gases and nutrients throughout your body – it includes the blood, heart, and blood vessels. The respiratory system helps you breathe and exchange gases – it includes the nose, trachea, bronchi, and lungs. The excretory system helps you get rid of wastes, while the digestive system helps you digest food.
