The findings are promising, but the system has some important limitations. It includes a number of assumptions that are based on the 1990s, current prices, fuel use, etc. It is not clear how important these limitations are to the value of the alternative electricity-generating technologies. Table 1 lists important data assumptions. Fig. 2 compares the technology and efficiency as a single figure, which the CO₂ intensity of the technology is multiplied by capacity, reflecting the ability to generate electricity. The capacity of the plants, and the development especially the growth rate, become crucial factors in determining the total CO₂ abatement. The investment prices are relatively unchanged from the 1990s (Fig. 3). It is possible to use a 2000 technology cost for nuclear, but this would be a little less (Fig. 4).

These guidelines will encourage other health-care professionals, architects and owners to rethink design, installation, use and cost of equipment in a responsible, health-conscious, safe setting with the added safety for the patient, the healthcare worker, the visitor, the caregiver and the community. The use of equipment in a safe setting is a goal for all health-care professionals and the community. The use of equipment in a safe setting is a goal for all health-care professionals and the community.

The 1980-1990 economic crisis has had deep effects, above all, among the poorest of populations and among the population of the urban safety peripheries and their construction with the subsequent stages of the transition to a more democratic society with the entry of a new state.
