

When the switch is closed, the circuit is complete and the light bulb glows. This is because the battery provides a potential difference that drives the current through the wire and the light bulb.

The current flows from the positive terminal of the battery, through the switch, and then through the light bulb, before returning to the negative terminal of the battery.

The light bulb glows because the current heats the filament inside the bulb, causing it to emit light.

This simple circuit demonstrates the basic principles of electricity: a potential difference (voltage) is needed to drive a current through a conductor, and the current can do work, such as lighting a bulb.

In this circuit, the two light bulbs are connected in parallel. This means that each bulb has its own path to the battery, and they both receive the full voltage from the battery.

Because the bulbs are in parallel, they both glow with the same brightness as they would if they were connected to the battery individually.

This circuit shows how components can be connected in parallel to ensure they all receive the same voltage and operate independently.
