Essays on Market Response to Changes in Costs and Price Transparency Anna Olga Smolnik,2017-01-25 The dissertation consists of three empirical studies and takes a closer look at price fluctuations using German gasoline prices as an example for a homogenous good It analyzes consumers' reaction to price fluctuations and respectively the pricing behavior of firms The first paper which was developed with co-authorship explores consumers' online price search effects on the pricing behavior of firms gasoline price level and price dispersion As regulators have recently implemented a mechanism for reporting all price changes to a central data base the core assumption of this price reporting scheme is that the increase in price transparency will lead to a decline in the price level and a reduction in price dispersion The second study addresses the question whether German gas stations adjust their retail prices asymmetrically in response to crude oil price changes i.e. whether gas stations react quicker to crude oil price increases than to crude oil price decreases The third study aims to analyze whether consumers react more strongly to gasoline price increases or to price decreases when considering buying a new vehicle
