

289. Effects can be plausibly identified as caused by social action:

That helps explain why some social scientists, drawing the point and back some point, believe there is something to the idea of social causation.

However, other people are skeptical of the generalizability of social causation. They think it is simply wrong to say that social causation is a general concept and that it is simply wrong to say that social causation is a general concept.

290. Theories and other arguments against the generalizability of social causation:

291. Social causation is a general concept and is not a general concept:

Should we then agree to disagree with this? Please give your answer.
