MECHANICAL DESIGN

The major difference in design between the Type U-4 Ed. 4 and the preceding U-4 Magnetos is the adoption of the single rotating distributor brush with stationary segment track instead of the stationary four brush system with single rotating segment. (See Fig. 2). The high tension current is collected from the collector ring by the brush (141) at the lower end of the distributor track and then carried to the center brush (83) which rests against the metal segment of the distributor rotor. The brush in the rotor distributes the current to each of the four distributor terminals through the metal segments in the distributor track. The track is fastened to the bakelite distributor plate by means of countersunk-head machine screws.

One of the important features of the Edition 4 Magneto is that it is unnecessary to remove the distributor plate in order to locate the segment upon which the brush is resting. Protruding from the end of the distributor shaft is a pointed indicator, the point of which is in direct line with the distributor brush. By observing the pointer, it can be determined upon which segment the brush is then resting. This feature greatly facilitates the timing of the magneto to the engine. See page 3101i for timing instructions.

The construction of the armature is practically the same as that used on previous editions with the exception of the collector which is $\frac{3}{4}$ " wider, providing further assurance against sparking and burning. A grease trap is placed between the collector
