My dad is a superhero. He dons the cape and the inside-out underwear. No one else can see them, but I know he wears them. As I step up to the microphone, palms sweating and throat parched, I almost forget the line I so dutifully memorised to say aloud at my first school assembly. Dad isn't here with Mum, but that's okay. He's probably out fighting supervillains.

My dad is a hero. He dons the armour and draws the sword. No one else can see them; they're all asleep, but I know he bears them. As I see myself rapidly losing the epic battle against the monsters of the night, Dad comes to save me. His words are harsh, but that's okay. He's probably had a long day, and I'm sure he means well, but as much as it frustrates him, this is a battle best won by Mum. He feels bad, but I know it's okay.

My dad is amazing. He dons his dirty white polo shirt and ill-fitting blue jeans. No one else can see him; he's at the back, but I know he's here. As I walk up to collect my certificate - a single sheet of paper which somehow stands to represent everything I've achieved - the shiny golden trim and and heavy, stocky feel remind me of how hard I've worked to get here. Dad stands. I wish he wouldn't. His deep, bellowing cheers and almost jarringly loud whistles have no place at an event such as this. But it's okay, I guess. At least he made it here. I'm sure he was busy at a party or something. Mum's beaming smile, stretching from cheek to cheek with all the sincerity in the world, comforts me. She can see my smile, equally as jubilant - from the front row. She arrived here well before anyone else to make sure she would be able to see me at my graduation. She loves me.
