Abstract The authors of this paper have been involved in a number of research projects, and have been developing a range of approaches to research. It is these that they describe, and which they then use to discuss the implications for a range of issues in literature, and which they argue are of relevance to general education studies. Indeed it is these, rather than the use of the term 'ethnography' and the implications that it would have for research in education, that they discuss. And, finally, they argue that the fact that researchers' research is more meaningful to those who read about it than to those who do it, is a problem. But, they say, it is not a problem that can be solved.
