of 2008 Drawing on her extensive ethnographic research in Bologna Deng describes an immigrant group that relies on reciprocal and flexible family labor to make coffee deploying local knowledge gleaned from longtime residents who have come sometimes resentfully to regard this arrangement as a new normal The existence of Chinese espresso represents new features of postmodern and postcolonial urban life in a pluralistic society where immigrants assume traditional roles even as they are regarded as racial others The story of Chinese baristas and their patrons Deng argues transcends the dominant Eurocentric narrative of immigrant host relations complicating our understanding of cultural dynamics and racial formation within the shifting demographic realities of the Global North
