Q1. Two Features of Adaptive Plasticity:

- Recrouting – neurons near damaged area that has lost connection with its neuron seek new active connections with healthy neurons.
- Sprouting – new dendrites grow with more branches to make more connections.

Also:

– New connections between neurons (synapses) are formed or connections are altered (as a consequence of change to environmental conditions when learning something new, or when re-learning something after brain injury).

- Other areas compensating for areas of damage
- Occurs throughout life

Q2. One advantage of using a dimensional approach to classify mental disorders compared to the categorical approach:

Any one of the following would be appropriate:

- Dimensional classification does not attempt to place people into discrete, diagnostic categories. Instead, key characteristics are identified upon which all persons can be placed, recognising that mental disorders lie on a continuum with mildly disturbed and normal behaviour, rather than being qualitatively distinct.
- The dimensional approach is better able to capture many of the subtleties and complexities of person's life that are missed within the categorical systems.
- The dimensional approach evaluates symptoms not only on their presence, but also on their severity or degree. Categorical Approach only looks at presence or absence of the disorder.
