Abstract

These two conditions are met by predominantly female study subjects, mostly single/married women, who are different from previous studies, based on either a community or a clinical sample and without clinical risk factors (e.g., depression, anxiety, etc.). The results presented here are thus encouraging for the study of the effects of stressors on the health of women, and more specifically, for the study of the effects of stressors on the health of women with a history of sexual abuse.
