Argument

Since women also usually enjoy other advantages besides education, provided it is the most commonly known, the positive relation to literacy rates observed in the world is the direct consequence of the advantages of education, like income or health, not due to education. Since, therefore, the observed effect between literacy rates and economic development can be explained by the influence of the fact that the positive effect provided by education is not the only advantage, it is not the cause of economic development. It is possible, with confidence, to affirm that even if the observed effect between literacy rates and economic development is not due to the positive effect provided by the fact that women are educated, it is not due to the fact that women are educated, but due to the fact that women are educated and have other advantages, like income or health, which are the cause of economic development.
