

"Fast Food Nation" by Eric Schlosser: Chapter

In Chapter three, Schlosser begins by describing the view of Colorado Springs: its peaceful, serene, spectacular outlook from Gold Camp Road. It appears to be an all-American town with its independently owned businesses and layers of houses from many different historical eras. But then it's apparent what has happened in Colorado over the last twenty years as you come to the new spread out. The houses are the "architectural equivalent of fast food;" thousands of houses that are near identical line each street of each subdivision.

Academy Boulevard lies at the heart of this and resembles Harbor Boulevard in Anaheim, except newer, with its clusters of fast food joints repeating themselves every few miles. According to Schlosser, "the resemblance is hardly coincidental. " All the new housing expansions not only look like those in California, they are occupied with thousands of people from California. A whole way of life has been swapped from the West Coast to the Rockies. Schlosser says, "In many ways Colorado Springs today is what Los Angeles was fifty years ago... " It used to be a little tourist town inhabited by the wealthy and retired.

But during the Great Depression many moved away and tourism dropped. A great economic opportunity then came about with the start of World War II. "Like Los Angeles, Colorado Springs soon became independent on military spending. " The opening of bases and academies brought thousands of troops to the area, along with a direct capital investment. Still today, about half the jobs in Colorado Springs depend on military spending. One would be surprised to know that the largest private employer in the state of Colorado today is the restaurant industry, not aerospace, biotech, or any other industry of the future.

Schlosser states that, "the restaurant industry has grown much faster than the population. Over the last three decades the number of restaurants has increased fivefold... hain restaurants has increased tenfold. " It once had a total of twenty chain stores, now it has twenty McDonald's alone. Schlosser tells us that the McDonald's Corporation has used Colorado Springs as a test site. In the section of Chapter three Schlosser calls throughput, he begins by telling of a young teenage girl who works at a McDonald's for at least seven hours a day.

Schlosser explains that teenagers run the fast food restaurants not only of Colorado Springs but across the U. S. too. With two-thirds of the nation's fast food workers under the age of twenty-one, no other industry in the United States has a workforce so dominated by adolescents. This is the way the fast food industry prefers it. They seek out part-time, unskilled workers who are willing to accept low pay, and easy to control and teenagers are the perfect applicants for these jobs.

Not only have teenagers long provided the fast food industry w

Anthropocene Ecologies of Food Simon C. Estok,S. Susan Deborah,Rayson K. Alex,2022-06-22 Anthropocene Ecologies of Food provides a detailed exploration of cross cultural aspects of food production culinary practices and their ecological underpinning in culture The authors draw connections between humans and the entire process of global food production focusing on the broad implications these processes have within the geographical and cultural context of India Each chapter analyzes and critiques existing agricultural food practices and representations of aspects of food through various media such as film literature and new media as they relate to global issues generally and Indian contexts specifically correcting the omission of analyses focused on the Global South in virtually all of the work that has been done on Anthropocene ecologies of food This unique volume employs an ecocritical framework that connects food with the land in physical and virtual communities and the book as a whole interrogates the meanings and implications of the Anthropocene itself Motoring John A.
