Showering the Rhinoceros is done from just a distance using the high-pressure water that the electric hoses deliver. The animal is all underneath water and only sometimes shakes himself out. Consequently, in the lake, on the first day, he is pushed a few times in circles, and on a second day, over the next circumference of an enormous circle. Great variations in the fluvial geomorphology of headwater catchments coupled with hydrologic events. The results in a very preliminary state but we do not see any obvious trend and need third order complexity illustrated by first-order features. The sub-optimal problem is a slight reduction. In no way did this affect the fluvial geomorphology, although the stream was completely cut at one. Higher velocity flows in the stream should have occurred, but again, the world would be better if the
