But when the business comes for the solution, the entrepreneur has the history, the understanding of the customers, the key relationships, the contacts, the capability to get resources to succeed in the business. And so, with funding, the entrepreneur is creating a vehicle for the business to move forward, not to become the general manager of the firm. In general, managers like to work mathematically, strongly for staffing and reducing people's effort, and to build businesses that are better than the market. They are not strong in the areas of sales, better than the market, and understanding people, but have a limited involvement in general in their management business. They understand how to drive the business to the market and the mathematics of operating a business, but not the experience.

Offshore financial centers (OFCs) have long been a primary way to protect assets and to avoid a double tax on the same income stream. Beginning in the 1970s, companies began to use OFCs to protect their assets from the risk of expropriation or other adverse events. In addition, OFCs have been used to avoid double taxation on income earned in one country and then repatriated to the United States. The growing use of OFCs in the 1970s led to the creation of the OECD's 1990 guidelines for OFCs, which are now widely used by governments and private companies alike.
