Abstract

Received 10 September 2003; accepted 10 November 2003
Published online 10 December 2003

Abstract. Streptococcus pneumoniae is a leading cause of pneumonia, meningitis, and other invasive diseases. The pathogenesis of pneumonia is complex, involving a variety of virulence factors, including surface-associated structures. The pneumococcal surface is covered by a layer of polysaccharide called the capsule, which is essential for virulence. The capsule is composed of repeating units of N-acetylmuramic acid (NAM) and D-glucose, which are linked by α 1,3-glycosidic bonds. The capsule is also decorated with various surface-associated structures, including the pneumococcal surface-associated protein (PSA), the pneumococcal surface-associated protein 2 (PSA2), and the pneumococcal surface-associated protein 3 (PSA3). These structures are involved in various processes, including adherence, invasion, and evasion of the host immune response. In this review, we will discuss the role of the capsule and the surface-associated structures in the pathogenesis of pneumonia.
