Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence during childhood and those who had not. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (N = 9,800) were used to examine the association between exposure to violence during childhood and self-reported depression among adolescents aged 15–17 years. Results showed that exposure to violence during childhood was associated with higher rates of self-reported depression among both males and females. However, the association was stronger for females than for males. These findings suggest that exposure to violence during childhood may have a more significant impact on the mental health of females than males.
