Research in the United States and Germany has shown that there is a significant positive relationship between the number of days and hours spent in the workplace and the degree of job satisfaction. In Figure 1, we can see that the German-based study and the Japanese-based study have similar results. Both studies show that job satisfaction is positively related to the number of days and hours spent in the workplace. The Japanese-based study shows a stronger relationship between job satisfaction and the number of days and hours spent in the workplace than the German-based study. This may be due to the fact that the Japanese-based study was conducted in a more homogeneous culture, where the relationship between job satisfaction and the number of days and hours spent in the workplace is more likely to be consistent.

It has been suggested that there are two different types of stress: acute stress, which is short-term stress, and chronic stress, which is long-term stress. Acute stress is a response to a specific stressor, such as a sudden change in the environment or a threat to one's safety. Chronic stress is a response to a persistent stressor, such as a long-term illness or a difficult life situation. Chronic stress can lead to a variety of health problems, including heart disease, high blood pressure, and depression.
