Biological and chemical processes, such as photosynthesis and respiration, are essential for the survival of all living organisms. These processes involve the exchange of matter and energy between the organism and its environment. For example, photosynthesis is the process by which plants and other autotrophs convert light energy into chemical energy, storing it in the form of glucose. This glucose is then used by the organism for energy and growth. Respiration, on the other hand, is the process by which organisms break down glucose to release energy. This energy is used to power various cellular processes, such as the synthesis of proteins and the movement of organelles. The study of biological and chemical processes is a fundamental part of understanding life and the environment.
