

With evidence for a connection between the presence of grey squirrels and A. f. cinereus in the Great Britain data, the experimental studies have provided the most direct evidence of a causal link between squirrel presence and the spread of A. f. cinereus. However, the experimental studies also have the potential to be confounded by the presence of other factors, such as the presence of other squirrel species, the presence of other factors that may affect the spread of A. f. cinereus, and the presence of other factors that may affect the spread of A. f. cinereus. Therefore, the experimental studies should be interpreted with caution.
