Abstract. This study examined how the social and cultural contexts of a community's experiences with violence affect the ways that young people in that community understand violence and respond to it. The study was conducted in a rural, low-income community in southern, urban-adjacent, metropolitan Chicago. The study included 10 focus groups with 40 young people, 16–24 years old, who were interviewed about their experiences with violence and their views on violence prevention. The study found that young people in this community have a strong understanding of the ways that violence is related to the social and cultural contexts of their community. They also have a strong understanding of the ways that violence is related to the ways that they and their community respond to it. The study also found that young people in this community have a strong understanding of the ways that violence is related to the ways that they and their community respond to it. The study also found that young people in this community have a strong understanding of the ways that violence is related to the ways that they and their community respond to it.
