The role and performance of Ofsted
Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Education Committee,2011-04-17 The House of Commons Education Committee concludes that splitting Ofsted into two new organisations the Inspectorate for Education and the Inspectorate for Children s Care will help to focus and improve inspection in this country The Committee believes a single children s inspectorate is too big to function effectively and needs greater elements of specialism to give people increased confidence in inspections Splitting Ofsted would raise confidence that the inspection of all settings is being carried out by inspectors with relevant training and experience Different approaches to inspection would flourish and the profile of Ofsted s non education remit which the Committee says Ofsted has not adequately communicated and of which many people are unaware would be given a welcome boost It is essential that the new Education Inspectorate prioritises reporting on progress made per pupil across the full range of ability groups and the Department for Education should seek to give these progress measures prominence comparable to other key measures such as five good GCSEs and the new English Baccalaureate Too few inspectors have recent and relevant experience of the types of settings they inspect Urgent reform of the Voluntary Childcare Register is needed says the Committee It heard evidence that the current operation of the register is seriously flawed and far from providing a reliable system of registration and safeguarding might mislead parents by suggesting a level of quality assurance that has not been undertaken
