Kay,2019 This thesis presents the application of robotics for the disassembly of electric vehicle lithium ion battery LIB packs for recycling Electric vehicle battery systems can be expensive and dangerous to disassemble therefore making it cost inefficient to recycle them currently Dangers associated with high voltage and thermal runaway 1 2 make a robotic system ideal for this task as the danger to technicians or workers is significantly reduced and the cost to operate a robotic system would be less expensive over the robot s lifetime The proposed method allows for the automated or semi automated disassembly of electric vehicle LIB packs for recycling In order to do this technicians who were involved in manually disassembling LIB packs were studied during the disassembly process and the modes and operations were recorded Various modes of interacting with the battery module were chosen and broken down into gripping and cutting operations Custom end of arm tooling was designed and prototyped for the robot with the tooling having an input output link to the robot Offline simulation was performed in both MATLAB Simulink and ROBOGUIDE in order to determine the appropriate tool paths and workspace layout for a mock battery module The input output communication for the end effector control was also set up using ROBOGUIDE For the gripper a control sequence utilizing a detection mode and a linear quadratic regulator LQR mode was implemented in order to ensure that the clamping force would not damage the battery cells as this could cause a thermal event A system identification method was also implemented in the form of a batch least squares estimator in order to form the state space representation of the planar linkages used in the control strategy of the gripper A high speed rotary cut off wheel was adapted for the robot in order to perform precise cutting at various points in the mock battery module case After development of the end of arm tooling two modes of operation were tested on a representative mock battery module These modes of operation consisted of cutting and pick and place After benchmarks were established performance metrics were created in order to validate the ability of the robotic system to disassemble the various components in the battery module With the various system modes the robot proved to both accurately and quickly disassemble the representative mock battery module The precision of the rotary cutter allowed for a more direct disassembly method as opposed to the standard manual method of prying and cutting the tabs thereby reducing the overall time required for disassembly These improvements to the process successfully demonstrate that a robot offers both safety and time improvements to the current manual disassembly process for electric vehicle LIB packs modules Battery Service Manual Battery Council International,2010 Storage Battery Technical Service Manual ,1987 The Automobile Storage Battery Otto A.
