choice in retail banking Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Treasury Committee,2011-04 In this report the Treasury Committee concludes that the pre conditions for effective competition in the retail banking market are not present The Committee highlights in particular a lack of price transparency and comparability in the personal current account market as well as the difficulty of switching The report calls on the Government to make competition a primary objective of the new regulatory body the Financial Conduct Authority FCA It also recommends a public interest test based on competition considerations for proposed future divestments of Government held stakes in the banks Given the continuing importance many consumers attach to a branch network especially for current account services the report notes that new entrants without access to an extensive branch network will be at a considerable disadvantage to established banks for the foreseeable future This means that the Government needs to examine carefully where it can help improve the conditions for effective competition New entry and reductions to barriers to entry and expansion may alone prove insufficient to tackle the problem of ineffective competition As a result the Committee urges the Independent Commission on Banking ICB to examine
