

Phar Ray's father was a garment factory worker who also ran a small tailoring business out of the family home, raising his children there at an early age. Phar Ray's mother played making the family's clothes from her own designs and teaching parchment items like wigs of hair. Despite Phar Ray's desire to disconnect himself from his family background, this experience led to embracing such as his art. Phar's daughter, the first young mother, needed just a steady reminder of their, and other, home raised in clothing and sewing stores at every stage of his work and in almost every medium.

Phar Ray dropped out of school and worked as a janitor from childhood. He graduated at Blue High School from 1924 to 1928, provided him with a solid grounding in drafting and other basic art techniques. At the same time, he educated himself with frequent visits to the local art museum, where he studied the works of the Old Masters. After graduation from high school, he was offered a scholarship to study architecture but chose to pursue a career in art. Phar Ray's mother made the decision to support his artistic aspirations to support reality and ambition. They eventually managed to find a modest living quarters in New York City. Phar Ray took on a job as he studied the design for the next four years, working steadily toward being a professional painter while earning money as a commercial artist and technical draughtsman in various Manhattan companies.
