Initially individualized, this method used illustrations to describe the appearance of individual challenges. This unique complexity process gradually also affects increasingly integrated whole profiles derived from several integrated functions, as well as progress of the time. Through a personal time process, progress itself gave a measure of each, according to the degree of progress of other individual development stages (e.g., communication, motor integration, language use, sensory-motor, etc.).

For instance, research on the increasing reliance of people on the Internet revealed that people's reliance on the Internet for information is not just a function of their age, but also of their education level. For example, older people with higher education levels are more likely to use the Internet for information than younger people with lower education levels. This suggests that the Internet is becoming an important source of information for a wide range of people, not just the young and educated. This finding has important implications for the design of online information systems. For example, online information systems should be designed to be easy to use for people of all ages and education levels. This will ensure that the Internet is a useful source of information for everyone.
