The following findings are better understood if different cellular mechanisms underlying the response to psychosocial stressors are found to be differentially regulated according to different levels of development or organizational complexity. For example, stressors involving maternal separation, maternal loss, and hunger in humans and other mammals elicit differentially regulated responses depending on the different cellular mechanisms that regulate feeding behavior. In fact, different cellular mechanisms are involved in the human response to maternal separation depending on the developmental stage of the individual, with the response being more related to the activation of the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis in the neonate and to the activation of the sympathetic nervous system in the adult.
