Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week resistance training program on the strength and endurance of the lower extremities in healthy young adults. The study was a randomized controlled trial. The participants were divided into two groups: the control group and the intervention group. The control group performed no resistance training, while the intervention group performed a 12-week resistance training program. The primary outcome was the change in the maximum strength of the lower extremities, measured by the 1RM of the leg press. The secondary outcome was the change in the endurance of the lower extremities, measured by the number of repetitions performed at 50% of the 1RM. The results showed that the intervention group had a significant increase in both the maximum strength and the endurance of the lower extremities compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week resistance training program is effective in improving the strength and endurance of the lower extremities in healthy young adults.
