Improving aneurysmal Subarachnoid hemorrhage management, what's new? Massimo Del Sette,Emanuela Crobeddu,Marcello Egidi,Luca Valvassori,2024-08-12 Aneurysmal subarachnoid hemorrhage aSAH still represents a significant cause of morbidity and mortality around the world and its outcome can be dramatically impacted by early and expert care SAH treatment comprises early neurosurgical or endovascular treatment of the ruptured aneurysm strategies to reduce further neurological injury and managing systemic complications In fact management of aSAH is a multidisciplinary issue and the current state of knowledge is in rapid evolution Nevertheless the guidelines are not up to date The last American aSAH guidelines were issued in 2012 and covered literature up until May 2010 and in 2013 members of the Guidelines Committee of the European Stroke Organization reviewed them from a European standpoint Since then considerable advances have been made in diagnostic methods surgical and endovascular techniques and clinical management paradigms Subarachnoid hemorrhage is still a relevant health problem and although its incidence varies among populations a quarter of patients affected by aSAH die and approximately half of survivors are left with some persistent neurological deficit Taking into account the fact that the prognosis of aSAH patients is affected by multiple factors and that some of them can be influenced by therapeutic strategies and management procedures we believe that there is a need to reassess which interventions provide the greatest benefit to patients
